Production Tracking — Task Lists, Logs and Burndown

Project brief

The original personal production archive contains tracking spreadsheets and weekly progress presentations. The recovered workbooks preserve task-list, work-log and burndown/burnup organization; selected local CSV exports are available below. These records expose practical production work behind the project reflection. They are useful evidence of how tasks and progress were communicated, with the original archive retained for context.

Ownership

Personal production-tracking artifact author

Evidence focus

Compare estimated and remaining tasks with the recorded work log, then read the postmortem for context. Preserve each workbook version rather than silently merging records into a fabricated clean timeline.

Scope

The source grade applies to the submitted archive, not a newly graded workbook. Logged hours and progress are source records, not independently audited productivity metrics.

Skills

Scope tracking, remaining work, progress communication, evidence organization