Selected project evidence

Production Tracking — Task Lists, Logs and Burndown — Personal production-tracking artifact author. The original personal production archive contains tracking spreadsheets and weekly progress presentations. The recovered workbooks preserve task-list, work-log and burndown/burnup organization; selected local CSV exports are available below. These records expose practical production work behind the project reflection. They are useful evidence of how tasks and progress were communicated, with the original archive retained for context.

Robo-Intero — Team Postmortem — Contributor to a five-student team project. Robo-Intero is a moral-dilemma game concept inspired by Papers, Please and developed within a five-student team project. The postmortem reflects on collaboration, milestones and communication problems rather than presenting only a success story. Personal tracking workbooks and progress artifacts provide additional production context. Together, these documents support an honest discussion of what the team learned and how process affects the work.

Capstone — Production Shadowing — Production-shadowing participant and log author. This capstone shadowing log records exposure to production milestones, timelines and staffing work. It provides a practical companion to the Agile paper by documenting what was observed in a production context. The artifact is useful when explaining how planning concepts relate to the coordination behind development. I present it as shadowing experience and written observation rather than inflating it into ownership of the capstone project.
